

At Capital Day School, we turn children into independent learners

Our main goal at CDS is to turn our students into independent learners. To achieve this, we constantly expose them to academic and artistic challenges- and we teach them the critical thinking skills to master those challenges. Our teachers create curriculum in which students practice the curiosity, self-motivation, self-examination, accountability, and persistence that are the hallmarks of successful independent learners. This means that our graduates are able to perceive and enact the adjustments needed to be successful in new situations- academic and otherwise.

We all want this ability for our children, as we know they will inherit an increasingly complex world that demands adaptability and persistence. At CDS, our teachers prioritize skill development over content mastery. As a result, our students can face their academic and personal challenges with confidence. All students need to become independent learners; at Capital Day School, our students do.

Perspectives

What our Community Members say about a Capital Day Education

You come to learn at Capital Day so you can do in high school.

Eric Brown, current parent

The tools and life lessons that students have learned at CDS will follow them through high school and beyond. CDS alumni have a collective commitment to serving others.

Andrew

Bates, Class of 2011

At Capital Day, my children learned to recognize what they didn't know, access resources, and teach themselves to adapt to a rapidly changing world.

Pat Greer, board member and past parent

The personalized instruction that our daughters received from caring instructors and staff was a key element to help them succeed in an environment that stressed high expectations.
